Basic Principles

The Nara Women's Higher Normal School was established in 1908. 1949 saw the promulgation of the National School Establishment Law and the school was accordingly re-established as Nara Women's University, with Nara Women's Higher Normal School as its predecessor. The purpose of the institution and its academic research activities is as follows: "The University exists to provide female students with the highest learning environment. This, together with our efforts to spread knowledge and awareness, shall ensure that we will be a center of scholastic culture and research and our development will deepen our scholastic scope in professional and research terms. We will also contribute to cultural development as a whole" (from the University's academic statutes).

The intellectual independence of the woman in society is linked to the development of her intellectual abilities, and in this regard Nara Women's University is responding to the current needs of society and the changing nature of the times we live in. In 2000 four fundamental principles were put in place:

- (1) To cultivate human resources that will lead to a gender-equal society.
Towards a university that disseminates information for the empowerment of women.
- (2) To enhance liberal arts education and basic education as well as upgrading professional education.
- (3) To conduct high level basic research and to pursue interdisciplinary research.

Promotion of international exchange and contribution to the regional society.
